There are about sixty mutineers. The whole battalion does not report more than two hundred men, a large portion of which are on detailed duty. There was but about thirty men in camp on duty yesterday. Colored troops arrested and now guard the insurgents. So far as we are informed, the wrong conduct of these men has been merely negative. They simply refused to do duty, giving as a reason, that orders had been sent from Washington several times for their muster-out, and that they were entitled to it, the war being ended.

In the meantime, colored troops are doing guard duty in the city of Galveston.

Emigration to the States.

Emigration to the States.

The number of the emigrants from Germany, says the Paris correspondent of the London Herald, arriving at Havre to take ship for America, has lately increased in an extraordisary degree. A Havre journal states that there are not less than a thousand emigrants now lodging in the quarter of St. François alone awaiting vessels to take them out. Two days since eighty persons left Havre for England in the hope of getting off earlier.

Havre for England in the hope of getting off earlier.

The same journal remarks that this increase of emigration coincides with a great extension of the commercial relations between France and the United States. Not less than twenty-five vessels are shortly expected at Havre from New Orleans, one from Texas, and five from Mobile, all laden with cotton. A considerable quantity of the same material is also being shipped for Havre from New York, along with other merchandise. In short, the import trade at Havre has not been so brisk for five years past.

The emigration to North America, says the correspondence of the London Times, dated March 12, is daily assuming greater proportions. Up to the end of May ten thousand persens have already engaged to leave, via Hamburg and Bremen. The emigrants are nearly all Northerners and Protestants, whereas, ten years ago, the vast majority consisted of Southerners, many of them Roman Catholies.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S POLAC Whatever may have been the mobility of Mr. Johnson's policy, says the Paris Debate of March 16th, either before his elevation to the Presidency or since, it is certain that a intelligence than his adversaries the true in taken by the North against the South, no only in the name of liberty against slavery, but for the security of the American Union Can those who contested then so energet cally and legitimately the right of the cor fedefates to recede from the Union now with out flagrant contradiction deny them th right to re-enter it.

After the frightful war which has so oundly injured the country the Unit States can have no more pressing duty than that of reconstructing that Union, which is the foundation and strength of their unity power and influence. To oppose the plans for that purpose pursued by the Executive power—to exclude by special laws the Rep resentatives of the South—is it not, in real ity, to prolong the state of war, and to per potuate dissensions and hostilities which every effort should be made to efface? Without doubt this work is difficult, and the Union only under efficacious guarantee against a new rupture; but it is not by system of absolute exclusion and perpetus uspicion that they are to be obtained.

Lord Manafield's advice to a young judge, never to give the reasons for his decision,
ought surely to be laid to heart by the judges of the Prussian Supreme Court. They have decided against the liberty of speech in the Chamber, and instead of contenting themselves with the promulgation of their decision, they have been sufficiently illi-adviced to publish their reasons.

Like all thines German, this document is ion, they have been sufficiently ill-navised to publish their reasons.

Like all things German, this document is of inordinate length and of more than proportional obscurity. The meaning of it may, however, be condensed into one sentence—that the eighty-fourth article of the Constitution, on which the deputies have hithertorelied for protection in the expression of their opinions, secures impunity for the expression of such opinions as they may have arrived at by the exercise of their understanding, but not for the statement of facts. by the exercise of their undenot for the statement of facts.

A more contemptible quibble was never put forth, nor one which will less bear investiga-tion. How an opinion can be formed on a question of fact without the exercise of the question of fact without the execuse of the understanding it is somewhat difficult to im-agine. The publication of a judicial decision based upon such a distinction is surely a sign of the subserviency of the judges, who have strangely fallen away since Napoleon de-clared that "there were judges in Berlin."

Soon after the train started Westcott went into a baggage car, and seeing baggage with his man's initials on it, secured its detention. Returning back, he found Jones aaleep, and awakening him and calling him by name, Westcott informed him he was a prisoner. At first Jones was somewhat surprised; but seeing he was oaught yielded up and was ironed.
